A "BOOM EDITOR."

He is a possible Republican candidate for Governor of Kansas. Hon. M. M. Murdock, of Wichita, Kan., whose name has been suggested in connection with the Republican gubernatorial nomination, is said by his friends to have been the original "boom" editor of the United States. His energies in this line were devoted to the advancement of the village, afterward town and now flourishing city of Wichita. General Lewis Wallace, the famous author of that wonderful religious novel, "Ben Hur," saw one of Editor Murdock's "boom" editorials, and he declared that it had "more brains and brawn" in it than anything he had ever read.

Mr. Murdock is at present the editor of the Wichita Eagle, which is a very flourishing journal. He is a native of Virginia, but he, like many another young man, took the advice which Horace Greeley had not then given and went west. He took part in the many exciting events which made Kansas in the early days of her statehood an exceedingly lively place to live in. In 1863 Mr. Murdock began his journalistic career by establishing the Burlingame Chronicle, which is still in existence. In 1871, however, having made up his mind that Wichita was destined to become a great city at some time, he moved there and started the Eagle, which he still owns. Then it was that Mr. Murdock's ability as a "boomer" was first manifested. Every issue of the Eagle fairly bristled with adjectives descriptive of Wichita's coming greatness. As the city now has a population of about 40,000, it is to be presumed that Mr. Murdock feels that his methods and confidence have been vindicated. The "boom editor" is a shrewd politician, too, and he has held several offices of honor and profit in Kansas, the most important being the lieutenant governorship and a state senatorship.

AN INTERESTING RELIC.

The Engine That Figured in the Andrews Raid Has Been Reconstructed. Of the many relics of the civil war to be seen at the Chicago World's fair few will excite more pathetic interest than the famous "General," the engine with which James J. Andrews and his squad of Federal scouts made their wonderful run on April 12, 1862. The world is familiar with their story. Under orders from General O. M. Mitchell they went down the Western and Atlantic road to break communication between Chattanooga and the points south and east. Of the twenty-two raiders eight, including Andrews, were hanged, eight escaped, and the remaining six were exchanged in 1863.

THE GENERAL.

The engine was turned out from the Rogers works in 1854, and continued in active service till late in 1890, when it was laid aside. After it had stood in all weathers for eighteen months, the proposition to red and take it to the World's fair excited general enthusiasm at Atlanta. It was put in charge of A. W. Collier, son of the master machinist of the W. and A., who supplied the worn out parts with exact fac similes of the original, and it was run through the city in good style and viewed by large crowds. With very slight exceptions, it is just as it was in 1862, and looks bright and new.

Mr. Jeff Cain, the engineer from whom the engine was stolen, as it were, still lives in Atlanta, and so do Captain Fuller, the conductor, and Mr. Anthony Murphy, the roadmaster, who joined in the pursuit. All the raiders who escaped received medals and other rewards, as did the pursuers. Mr. William Pittenger, one of the Andrews squad, has written an entertaining work on the affair, and several Confederate have given their testimony, and it is a fact worth noting that as to no other event in the war do the narrators agree so minutely in their statements.

The Home of Henry Clay.

At Ashland, the famous home of Henry Clay, the great granddaughter of that noted Kentucky statesman recently became the wife of a Louisville lawyer.

ASHLAND.

The house, a spacious red brick pile, covered in many places with English ivy planted by Mr. Clay himself, is upon a gentle eminence. From the front door a fine view is had of Lexington, a mile distant, the oldest city in the state, and beyond, across the hazy domes and roofs and spires of the intermediate town, in the Lexington cemetery, the monument to Clay erected by the state looms loftier than any other object in the landscape. At the back of the house, circumscribing a tennis court, is a picturesque walk, hidden from view by a rich tangle of oldtime garden shrubs and flowers. This path was the favorite walk of Mr. Clay.

Ashland is named for Henry Clay's first home in Hanover county, Va. His granddaughter, Miss Annie Clay, married Major Henry Clay McDowell, one of the most prominent of Kentuckians and owner of many of the finest horses in the country. It is the oldest daughter of this couple, Miss Nannette McDowell, who has just been married to Dr. F. S. Bullock, of Louisville. The bride, who is a dainty, diminutive little "blonde coquette," a simple hearted, big brained womanly woman, was a flower in her stately robes of rich cream silk heavily brocaded in arabesques of satin. Duchesse lace caught here and there with orange blossoms decked profusely her skirt and corsage. With her roses she carried the same point lace handkerchief her mother had borne to the altar.

Bishop T. U. Dudley performed the ceremony, assisted by Rev. E. H. Ward.

THEY ROB THE MAIL.

Methods Adopted by the Postal Pilferers.

EXPERIENCE OF AN INSPECTOR.

His Encounters With Persons Who Use the Mails for Fraudulent Purposes.

Wives of Women.

(Copyrighted, 1892, by the International Press Association.)

I am a postoffice inspector, with headquarters in a large Western city. This makes my nineteenth year in the service, and it is not strange that during that period I have accumulated some interesting knowledge as to the manner in which people will use the mails for criminal purposes. The United States mails have a peculiar fascination for criminals. It offers an extensive range of opportunities for irregularity by the public as well as by its own employees. The most common abuse on the part of the public is the claiming to have sent or received articles alleged to have been mailed. This is also a favorite with professional swindlers. It is hard to catch the latter class. This abuse is also popular between friends and acquaintances. Not long ago my attention was directed to an interesting case. One of the parties resides in a large Western city. The other is a Southern city. The latter was a woman who had cut quite a swell as an adventuress. The Northern man had been touched by her winning ways. He sent her a railroad ticket and $25 to go to his city. Both were sent by mail. The woman claimed never to have received them. The second day after I was notified I found that the ticket had been sold to a scalper which was prima facie evidence that the letter had been received. But the adventuress had covered up her tracks so thoroughly that I could not arrest her. This is a favorite trick with petty adventuresses.

There is a wide difference between the exposure of such transparent tricks as that and the burglary of an office, which is generally done by experts, whose plans are well laid and all evidence destroyed. The postoffice at Albuquerque, N. M., was robbed in a very methodical way. When the postal clerks had registered in from their runs and gone to bed, at about 3 o'clock in the morning, three burglars entered the rear door of the postoffice, seized the night clerk, a boy of 16, bound and gagged him, and proceeded to their work very deliberately. The postoffice room had formerly been used for a national bank and had in its rear a large vault the doors of which were customarily closed and locked with a key. In the rear of this large vault was a strong safe, which contained the postoffice funds, while the sacks of registered letters awaiting outgoing trains were put in the vault.

By closing the front doors of this vault the burglars were enabled to work without noise upon the safe and by six o'clock they had opened it, abstracted its contents, taken the registered letters from the sacks by cutting the latter open and had then gone on their way.

Early in the morning the postmaster engaged the local officers, who were assisted by detectives of the express companies, but very little could be discovered. When I reached the place the only clue found was a blacksmith's sledge, which lay among the weeds in the rear of the building. The owner of this we found after a diligent search to be a blacksmith half a mile away. He remembered that the day before the robbery a stranger had been in his shop asking questions and that the next morning he found his shop door forced open and some of his tools missing.

We next learned that this stranger was the son of a ranchman living five miles away and that he had gone from Albuquerque to a small town in Kansas. There we had him promptly arrested and himself and his baggage searched on suspicion, but as he gave a straight account of his proceedings and no stamps nor money were found upon him he was released.

The adjoining officers were thoroughly advised of the details of the robbery and the kinds and quantity of the plunder, and a month afterward word came from the marshal of Western Texas that a crew had been found there. The inspector was in that way put in communication with a prisoner awaiting trial for murder in El Paso. This prisoner told a fairly straight story, to the effect that he was hiding in a house on the Rio Grande, about five miles below Albuquerque, on the night of the robbery, and in the morning his friends, who were outlaws, came in with a lot of stamps and postal supplies, which they hid in the garden a few rods from the river.

Before he would give me their names he wanted the government to pay him enough to enable him to defend himself on his trial for murder. His figures were too steep, and before negotiations were completed with him he was tried and sentenced to be hanged. But I went with a guard to the place he described and found a deserted house which tallied accurately with his description, and we dug up soil enough in looking for the stamps, &c., to make a big garden, but did not find the valuables. Although the men had gone away, later on two of them were secured and connected with the burglary, but they were wanted also for a dozen like offenses that had prior attention of the court.

Not very far from Lebanon, N. C., about the same time, we had a case that was peculiar in some of its features and as sad as it was unusual. On a star route (that is, a route where the mails are conveyed by stage or horseback) running west from Salisbury, N. C., there had been many thefts of money from registered letters, and the department and the people thereabout were alike impatient to catch the thief. All the postmasters upon the route, about a dozen of them in all, bore excellent reputations, and all professed equal anxiety to have the guilty punished. I had been at work once on this case without success, and tried it again, taking every possible precaution the second time to conceal my proceedings. With a good assistant I put up a farmhouse, entirely off from the route, and where at our leisure we completed our plans for carefully testing the different offices.

The weather was very stormy, which favored us, as there were few people traveling upon the roads, and thus we were able to get around without the inquisitive discovering that strangers were in their neighborhood, which was very thinly settled at best. It was difficult then to decide which postmaster we should begin with, for usually the adjoining offices have to co-operate with and be in the inspector's confidence, and if the guilty one himself is one of the two so trusted of course he is put on his guard.

The last one to be suspected would naturally have been the postmaster at Bileville. She had been a school teacher, was of good family and had not only the respect but the confidence and sympathy of the people, because her husband was a worthless fellow who was serving a term in prison for larceny. On my first trip I rode over the route as a pretended book agent, I sat on the old stage conspicuously holding in my hand a flashy bound book when we reached her office and she came to the door and looked out at me. I was watching her covertly and did not fail to note that when she turned to go into the office she threw a quick look backward at me and spoke in a low voice to the carrier, who was coming out with the mail sacks.

Half an hour later I said to the driver in a joking way, "I believe I made a good impression on that pretty postmistress at Bileville. I wish I had showed her my book."

"Yes," he said, "and she asked me if you wasn't a postoffice inspector."

"What's that?" I asked.

"Oh, one of them fellers that go round catchin' up with the lame ducks. There's ben a lot o' stealin' on this road, and I wish they'd do somethin' about it. I'm gettin' blamed for it myself."

I inferred at once that unless the driver was a great deal smarter than he looked and acted he was not to be suspected, and from the quick suspicion of the postmistress that I was an officer that she herself was to be looked out for. So when I related this fact to my friend he agreed that we should first test the schoolmaster's office. The last theft reported had been about ten days before our visit, so that another was about due. We fired our lines in the usual way, sending four registered letters through the schoolmaster's hands. We got them ten minutes afterward. The carrier made a very brief stop. Nobody else had touched the letters.

They came out to our hands so clean and neat that we thought it impossible that they could have been tampered with. We opened them at once, however, and were astonished to find that all the four letters had been rifled. Returning to the office we found the stolen bills in the young woman's purse, and her usually sad face was lighted up a little with the success of her day's work. She at once confessed.

She soon afterward died of a broken heart, and upon her deathbed confessed. It is said, to having stolen the money for which her husband was imprisoned and placed it upon him so as to get rid of him.

Will be the ying according to Masonic rites and ceremonies, of the copstone of the new city hall at Saginaw on Friday, June 24. By acceptance by the local lodges of the order of the invitation to be present, extended by the Saginaw brethren, developed the thought that a low rate and the opportunity to go and return the same day would enable many to go who would not otherwise. Acting upon this idea the Masonic Home association arranged for a special train excursion from Grand Rapids, the profits arising from sale of tickets to be devoted to the maintenance of the Masonic Home, a matter in which all members of the order are interested. As an additional attraction Wurdur's band will accompany the excursion, furnishing music on the way and during the afternoon and evening exercises. Great preparations have been made by the Saginawians for the entertainment of visitors and an enjoyable time is anticipated. Special train will leave Union Station via G. R. & L. and D. L. AMERICAN INVESTMENTS IN INDIA. Something of Interest to all Americans.

A Calcutta letter says that American inventions and discoveries are fast displacing the older ones of English manufacture in the Indian Empire. Thus, a few years ago, the American harvesters and reapers were entirely unknown, where now there are many. The American telephone has been introduced in most of the large cities. Stranger than all, the old-fashioned, huge pills are fast giving place to Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets, or "P. P. P.," which were first introduced in London some years ago by their American proprietors. Every Englishman who enjoys good eating, must have his dinner pills, and it is not unusual to see distinguished persons draw from their waistcoats a tiny little vial of these Pellets, and take one with their wine.

After taking one you feel well, instead of bilious and constipated; your skin brightens, digestion and inclination are gone. They are mild and easily taken. They are tiny, sugar-coated, but thorough in result. One Pellet's hands, three to four are cathartic. They regulate and cleanse the liver, stomach and bowels—quickly, but thoroughly. They are guaranteed to give satisfaction.
